Introduction

I'm not going to spend a lot of time on the intro. What's pertinent is that I've come across a slew, yes, a slew of online fantasy 'thing' generators while creating my new RPG game. By things, I mean everything from lists of random names to strange items to generators that can create an entire world. I have used some of these tools before as inspiration for my stories and novels, and this time I'm tempted to use a whole bunch of them to create a brand new stories, just as a novelty and to shake things up from my usual method of writing.

So, I'm going to present the fantasy resource generators I found online on this document. Some of these generators I collected simply for the humor of it, by the way. The basic set-up will go like this. I'll write down the name of the generator, the name of the website where I found it, in bold, and a list of whatever I generated from it. Use the pre-generated items, or visit the website so you can generate your own samples.

This list is meant to inspire writers, RPG Game Master types, and anyone else interested in having such resources available. I have also included a couple of lists prepared by storytellers, as it does add to the overall theme of this document. If your list is on here, and if for any reason you would like your list not to be on here, please contact me and I will remove it right away.

Me email is raymond towers777 @ yahoo dot com. Updates to this document can be found on my website at Raymond Towers Dot Com, in the E-zines / Articles page.

About The Author - Raymond Towers is an author of fantasy, horror and science fiction that strays away from the mainstream, plus a little in the way of true paranormal and other genres. He has written and independently published a good number of titles, most of them full-length novels and collections, with several more on the way. The author has been a lifelong resident of warm and sunny southern California, a location that pops up frequently in his writing. At the moment, the author is looking for ways to reach new readers all over the world, in addition to pursuing his great love of writing and taking it to the next level.
